HOW IS VERDEE STRAND BAMBOO FLOORING MADE?

Verdee Strand Woven Bamboo Flooring is made by fine selected MAO bamboo being shredded into random strip sizes. The bamboo strips are immersed in non-toxic, water based glue, which fills and encapsulates the exposed cells and then compressed by 2,000 tones pressure with VOC-free adhesives. The solid block is left to stabilize in a resting position for 45 days before being processed into flooring material.

This process produces a denser, more stable, and harder floor product which is denser and harder than horizontal/ vertical bamboo floorings and most hardwood floorings like Oak, Maple and Cherry. It also creates a fine grained hardwood-like appearance to Verdee Strand Woven bamboo flooring with extraordinary strength and durability.

Besides, Verdee Strand Woven is finished by 8-layer Klumpp UV coatings for additional protection. Klumpp coating is well-known for its VOC-free, UV-resistance and scratch-resistance.

The image shows a close-up of a bamboo floor with a natural, light tan color and a visible grain pattern. The planks are laid in a diagonal orientation. A dark green rectangular box is positioned in the lower right area, containing white and light green text.

VERDEE STRAND WOVEN BAMBOO FLOORING GUARANTEED QUALITY

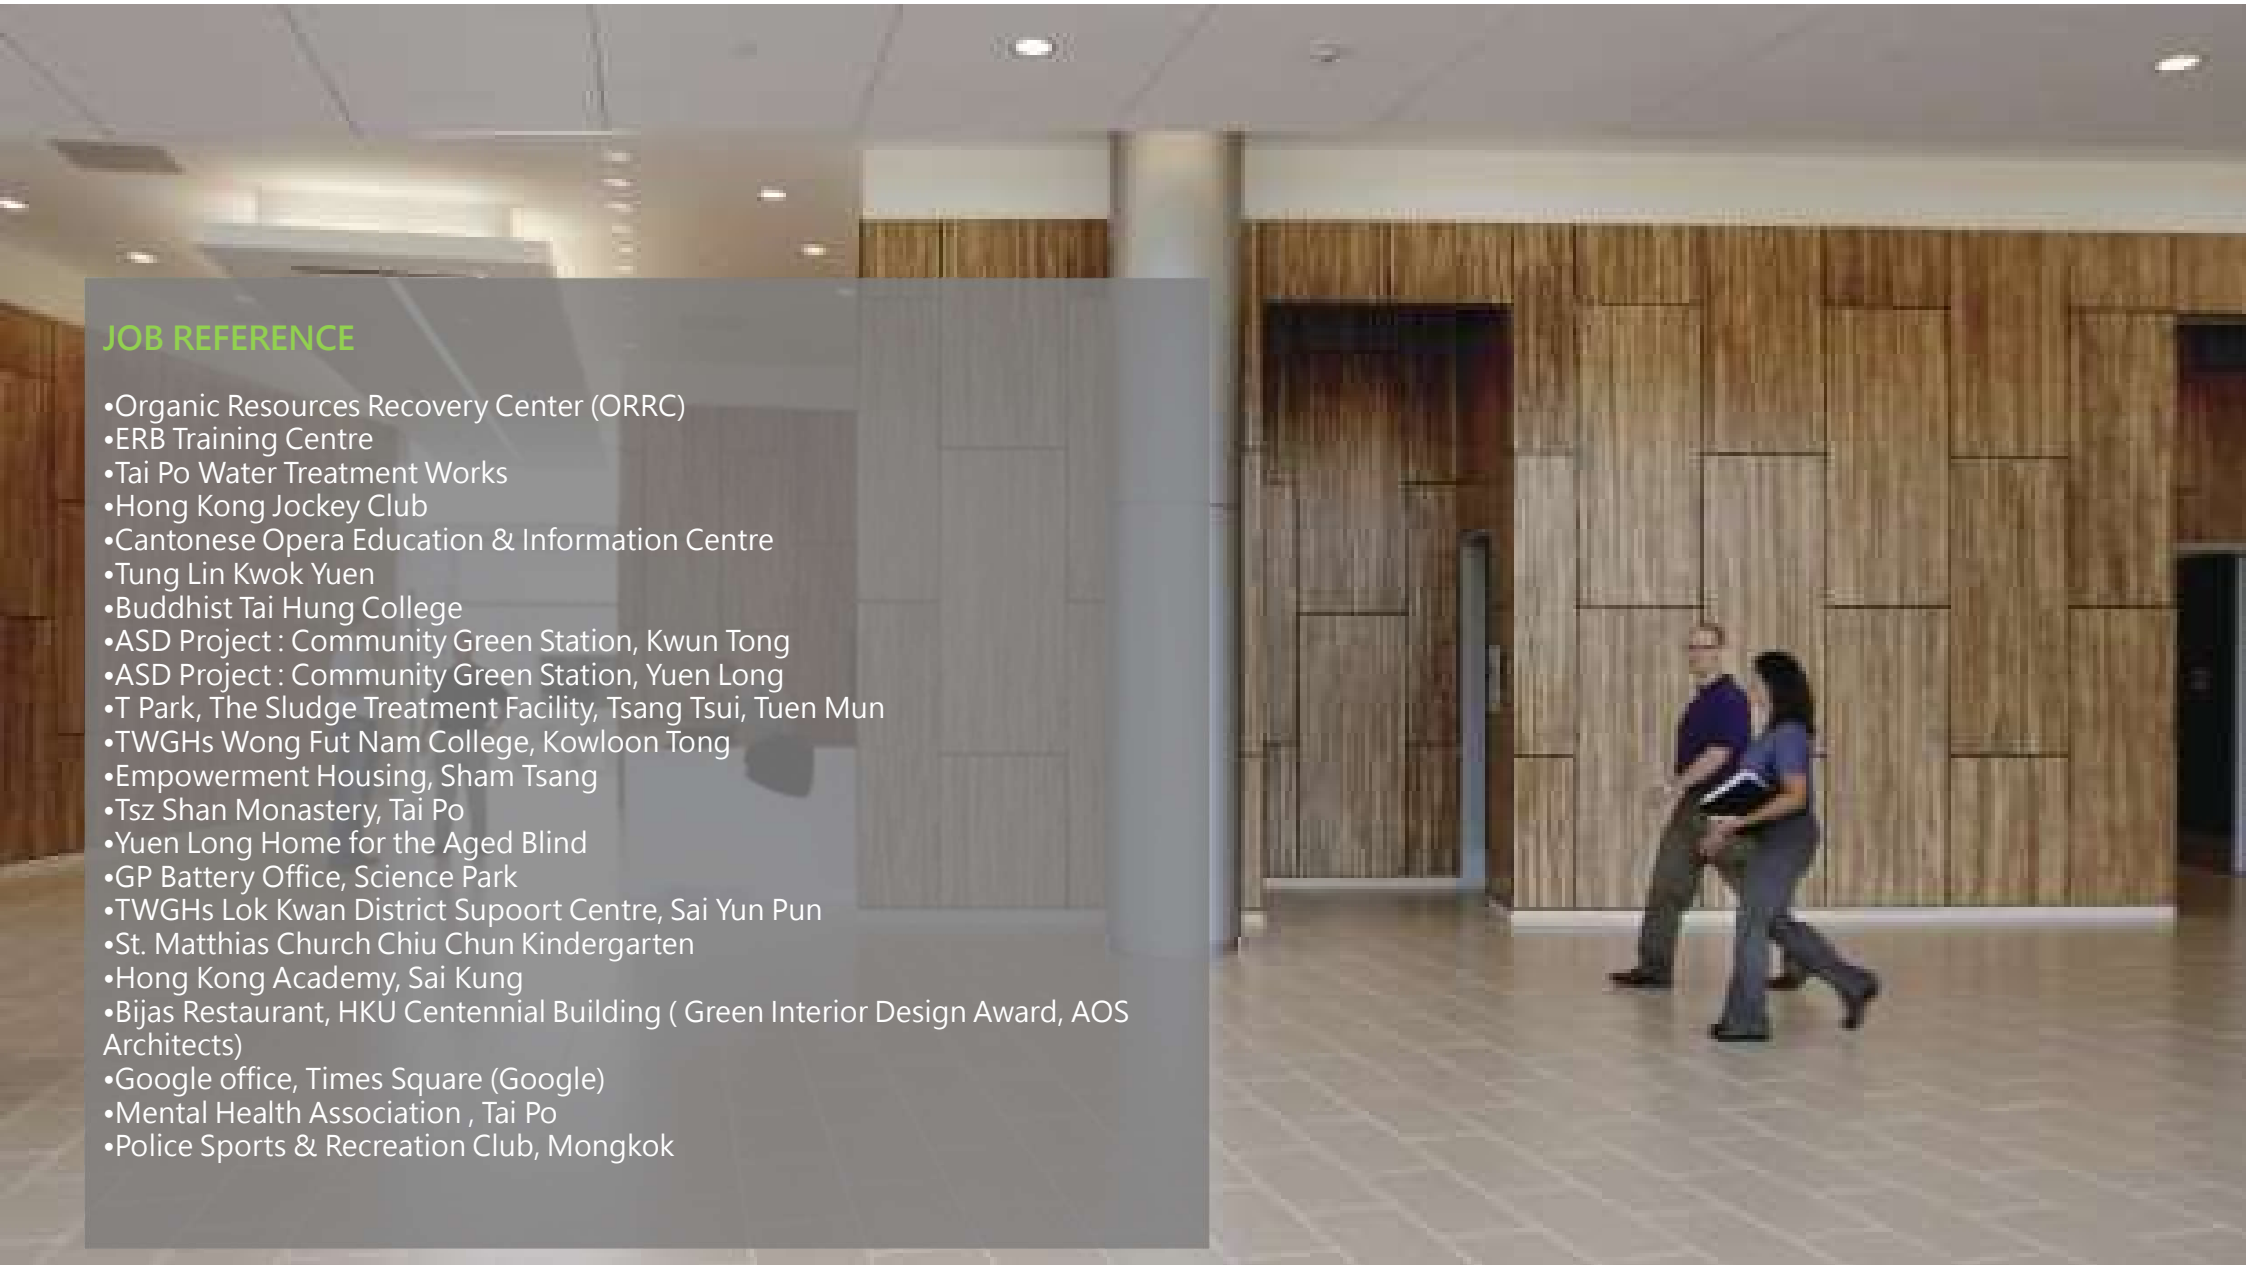

Different from hardwood, bamboo floorings, especially the strand woven ones, has its quality affected most during the manufacturing process.

For example, if the pressure is not enough or the lamination process is not done with care, cleavages or cracks may appear on the log. Moisture content should be under well control to avoid a large amount of moisture stay inside the board, which affects the heat contraction and expansion rate. Throughout the manufacturing process, Verdee Bamboo undergoes a strict quality control: from the raw materials, to the curing process, to the milling and finishing.

Quality control is how Verdee Bamboo has earned its reputation.
